

LA NOMS: Off The Eatin' Path

Tinfoil - Highland Park: It's hard to resist a good speakeasy, but a secret sandwich speakeasy tucked away in Highland Park? Irresistible. With the little help of a password, make your way through the corner liquor store to find a perfectly curated selection of meats and sandwiches made from locally sourced ingredients. Talk about little and fierce.

Taco Zone Truck - Echo Park: It's not always about the atmosphere; sometimes it's all about the meat. Open from 8:30pm - 2am, this taco truck isn't only for the drunk hipsters stumbling out of bright-light establishments. It's also for those of us willing to wait a little longer in the evening to have a perfectly marinated mulita melt in our mouths. Expert tip: Walk one block South anytime after midnight to the seemingly closed donut shop on the corner and knock on the window -- a wonderful Asian man making donuts for the next morning will happily greet and serve you a freshly made donut for .50 cents. You won't believe your senses.

Holy Roly Ice Cream - Koreatown: In this case, style is everything. I'm not saying that having your ice cream rolled into the shape of a large pirouette tastes better, but in a way, that's exactly what I'm saying. Hop over to spice up your ice cream game. We're on a roll ourselves.
